The first paragraph is your introduction. This should include a hook to grab the reader's attention. You should also include a thesis statement. Finally indicate the main points you will be covering in your paper. You also need to include any additional requirements your teacher may have instructed.

The next few paragraphs are body paragraphs. A good tip: if you are required to explain a certain number of examples, then put each example in its own paragraph. Remember to follow the TEES model. Start with a topic sentence. You will give your evidence and then expand on that evidence. End your paragraph with a summary sentence that transitions into the next body paragraph.

In your body paragraphs you need to use proper MLA citation. Here is an example of MLA citation (Wiesel 14). If you have a direct quote, here is an "example of proper citation" (Hemingway 15). Notice the placement of the parenthesis and punctuation.

Your entire paper should be in Time New Roman, 12 point font. Your paper should be double spaced and one inch margins. Each paragraph should have the first line indented and no extra space between paragraphs. You should have a header on your paper that includes your last name and page number. You will also include a works cited page to list all your resources.

Your final paragraph is your conclusion paragraph. You should rephrase your thesis statement and review your main points. Do not introduce any new material in the conclusion. You also need to include any additional requirements your teacher may have instructed.
